Israeli Philosopher Deplores Eichmann Execution Which Expiated German Guilt, Retarding Humanism Advance

Dr. Martin Buber, the noted Israeli philosopher, said he was inclined to view the execution of Adolph Eichmann as a "mistake of historical dimension." Eichmann, a former Gestapo colonel, was convicted by an Israeli court of having arranged the transportation of millions of Jews to Nazi death camps, says the New York Times. After rejection of his appeals, he was hanged in Ramle prison on May 31.

In an interview in his home in Jerusalem, Dr. Buber expressed fear that the act of taking Eichmann's life may have served to expiate the guilt felt by many young persons in Germany as a result of the actions of their elders in the years the Nazis were in power.

With that guilty conscience, these young persons in Germany were beginning to feel a resurgence of humanism, the bearded 85-year-old philosopher said.

Without that conscience, he said, an obstacle will have been removed from the growth of anti-human tendencies in them, and of anti-human forces that exist throughout the world, with neither conscience nor any real regard for humanity.

Dr. Buber sees this as a significant development in the final battle that is looming between human man and anti-human man. According to his philosophy, the battle has begun in its depths and is being fought more or less consciously in all peoples, cutting through all conventional power struggles of the great states.

While Dr. Buber would not speak of it, he is known to have talked with Premier David Ben-Gurion in an unavailing effort to persuade the Premier to oppose the execution of Eichmann.

"It was not a question of mitigation," Dr. Buber said. "Neither was it just a question of the penalty of death. People are mistaken in thinking that I opposed this simply as a consequence of my opposition to the penalty of death."

"For such crimes there is no penalty," he said. "I would not have dared to do what I have done if I had to think only about the crimes as such."

Dr. Buber's own personal views about the Nazi's crimes against the Jews have long been on record. He was himself a refugee from Germany, says Lawrence Fellows, Jerusalem writer of the New York Times. He taught at Frankfurt for the four years before he left for Jerusalem in 1938.

On Sept. 27, 1953 he was again in Frankfurt to receive the Peace Prize of the German Book Trade. He reached for a booklet on a shelf and read this excerpt from his address on that occasion:

"A considerable number of Germans — there must have been many thousands of them — under the indirect command of the German Government and the direct command of its representatives killed millions of my people in a systematically prepared and executed procedure whose organized cruelty cannot be compared with any previous historical event.

"I who am one of those who remained alive have only in a formal sense a common humanity with those who took part in this action. They have so radically removed themselves from the human sphere, so transposed themselves into a sphere of monstrous inhumanity inaccessible to my conception, that not even hatred, much less an overcoming of hatred, was able to arise in me."

Looking up from the page, Dr. Buber said it should be clear from this that his plea was not based on doubts about the severity of the sentence passed on Eichmann. Neither, he said, was it based on any feeling of pity.

"I feel here no pity at all," he said. "I have pity only for those whose actions I understand in my heart." But it should also be seen, he said, that it was pointless to seek retribution through the execution of Eichmann, for there can be no retribution for crimes of such magnitude.

In addition, he said, the crimes were so monstrous they fell outside the ordinary realm of punishment, and the death of Eichmann served none of the accepted purposes of punishment.

"I have no arguments against the trial itself," he explained, says the New York Times. From the moment of the kidnapping of Eichmann by Israeli agents in Argentina, he said, he accepted the fact that there must be a judgment.

He agreed that Jerusalem was the proper place for the trial, but he thought that Eichmann could have been brought before an international tribunal "with a certain adequate representation of humanity to give it the right kind of horizon."

"Israel's role should have been that of accuser and not of judge," the elderly philosopher said. "Once the trial began," Dr. Buber added, "it was utterly correct. As far as I can see, it gave the world a kind of information it either had not seen or had not wanted to see."

In Dr. Buber's view, Eichmann emerged from the trial in the image of a "monstrous part of a machine of totalitarian bureaucracy."

"He was no central figure," the professor added. "He was an important man, but his evil instincts were transformed into that monstrous action only by his will to serve his leader absolutely in the leader's plan of a 'total solution.' Eichmann's was a typical case of the self-destruction of the human conscience."

The philosopher reflected for a moment, then added, says the New York Times, "I lived five years in this atmosphere. I had occasion to meet some of these people. I know something about them."

Israeli Attorney General Pleads For All Nations To Ratify Genocide Convention, At Bnai Brith Conclave

A small, baldish man of intense mien appealed to the civilized world to guard against the recurrence of genocide. The man was Gideon Hausner, Israel's Attorney General and the chief prosecutor of Adolph Eichmann, the Nazi official convicted of the mass murder of Jewish men, women, and children. Mr. Hausner spoke in Washington, D.C., as a delegate to the Bnai Brith convention at the Statler-Hilton Hotel.

Addressing Bnai Brith's banquet session, Mr. Hausner warned that it was "a dangerous illusion to believe that small doses of hate radiation are not dangerous."

His unscheduled speech was delivered in an atmosphere of intense silence, writes Irving Spiegel in the New York Times. He urged that the Jewish community "be the bearers of a message to the world — that any party, any regime, any country, which bases its policies on the intended destruction of fellow men is bound to end where Hitler did."

Mr. Hausner did not refer to Eichmann. But, in a sharp indictment of the Nazi regime, he pleaded for all nations to ratify the genocide convention adopted by the United Nations in 1948.

The genocide convention brands as an international crime the mass murder of racial, religious, or ethnic groups. Sixty-five nations have ratified the convention. The United States has not. The Soviet Union ratified it in 1954.

Mr. Hausner declared that laws against genocide, "even if they are universally adopted, will not by themselves save us from evil." But he said men could achieve a highly significant psychological and educational impact. He asserted:

"Once it is declared that it is a universal crime to commit, conspire, or incite acts which may cause serious bodily or mental harm to innocent people of a certain racial, religious, or national group, another step in the right direction will have been taken."

Mr. Hausner scored "Neo-Nazi propaganda" which contends that "the whole story of the destruction of the Jews is a fabrication."

"It hardly seems possible that such delusions could be accepted by any man, yet they are," he declared. In an allusion to the Arab states, says the New York Times, Mr. Hausner said that his nation was confronted with some "dictators who make no bones about their intention to annihilate that part of the surviving remnant of Jewry which lives in Israel."

Senator Jacob K. Javits called on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to reopen hearings on ratification of the genocide convention. A Senate subcommittee, the New York Republican said, first reported the convention favorably to the Foreign Relations Committee in 1950.

The Senate has resisted action on ratification of the genocide convention because many Senators regard such matters as "international laws" that might be considered an encroachment on United States sovereignty.

A delegation led by Label A. Katz of New Orleans, president of Bnai Brith, spent thirty minutes with President Kennedy at the White House. Mr. Katz said that the group had discussed civil rights, problems of Soviet Jews, and the Middle East. He described the President's position on the Middle East as "reassuring."

The President was presented with a silver wall plaque decorated with traditional symbols of Judaism. Accompanying Mr. Katz to the White House were Isaac Goldman, of Lowell, Mass., honorary president of Bnai Brith; Maurice Bisgyer, of Washington, executive vice president; and Mrs. Moe Kudler, of Los Angeles, president of Bnai Brith Women.

The convention honored Dr. Jonas E. Salk, discoverer of polio vaccine, for his "creative leadership in the field of preventive medicine," says the New York Times. Dr. Salk received a plaque commending "his persistence in research which has profoundly influenced our health and welfare."

Aufbau Expert Had Won Iron Cross, Been Exiled

Dr. Kurt Kersten, a staff member of Aufbau, German-language weekly, published in New York primarily for readers who had fled Hitler, and author of several German and Russian histories, died after a long illness in St. Luke's Hospital. He was 71 years old and lived at 1050 Amsterdam Avenue, says the New York Times. Dr. Kersten was born in Germany. During World War II, he was an officer in the German army and won the Iron Cross First Class. But his experiences made him a foe of German militarism.

After his graduation from the University of Munich, Dr. Kersten served the Weimar Republic as a publicist and became an outspoken enemy of the Nazi movement. When Hitler came to power, Dr. Kersten was expatriated. He went to Prague and later to Paris, where he published a book, "Propaganda as a Weapon."

In World War II, when the Germans occupied Paris, he went to Casablanca. From there he set out for the United States, but the ship on which he sailed was captured by a Vichy destroyer. Dr. Kersten was taken to Martinique, where he lived until 1946, the year in which he finally succeeded in coming to the United States.

On Aufbau, where he had worked since then, he was the German and Russian political expert. He also wrote for German and Swiss newspapers. Last year, on his seventieth birthday, the former president of West Germany, Theodor Heuss, sent him congratulations on a "life-long effort against the evils which have plagued Germany."

Says Help From Germans Brought Hitler Success

Hitler's abnormalities and certain aspects of the German national character contributed to his rise to power in Germany, said a psychoanalyst, Dr. Norbert Bromberg, of Tarrytown, N. Y. He told the American Psychoanalytic Association at the Royal York Hotel, in Toronto that Hitler's abnormalities (he called him a psychotic) served him well in seizing and holding immense power.

The most prominent feature of Hitler's personality was his tremendous destructive drive and towering hate, Dr. Bromberg said.

"All his life he had no one really to live for," the psychoanalyst added, says the Globe and Mail. "This is probably one of the contributing factors in his boldness in taking great risks when he was achieving and had achieved power. He really had nothing to lose but his life. . . ."

The German people's acceptance of Hitler had something to do with crowd psychology, Dr. Bromberg suggested. Dr. Bromberg quoted from "The Crowd", by Le Bon, written in 1895: "By the very fact that he forms part of an organized crowd, a man descends several rungs on the ladder of civilization."

Dr. Bromberg said a crowd "behaves and seems to think and feel, in many aspects, remarkably like the psychotic character such as Hitler was."

But there must have been cooperative influences in the German nation to account for Hitler's success, Dr. Bromberg said. "Certain features of the German national character," he said, "strong-

A WORLD HALF-PROSPEROUS, HALF-STARVED

these new nations, with a greatly increased standard of living, and I feel could even result in a profit to the investing nations. While this plan of developing these nations individually was being carried out, it would require so much capital goods and materials as to make for added great production and prosperity at home.

Canada's history of industrial development presents us with a revealing example. A great many people, disturbed by the conditions in troubled Europe, desiring to find new homes and new opportunities, emigrated to Canada and many virile and ambitious people settled here. They had no capital and very little know-how.

Fortunately, Britain took a great interest in Canada by providing capital, management, and many other resources. We grew and prospered, and later on our opportunities attracted capital and people from the United States who further helped to develop our country greatly to where we are today, a leader of the Middle Powers Group, enjoying one of the highest standards of living in the world. What is more, and this lesson should not be lost sight of in the context of my remarks, while we in Canada grew wealthy and important these two countries which helped us so greatly derived a good return on their investment.

To my mind, complicated as the question is of the various degrees and stages of development in the Caribbean and Latin American region, and the region of Asia and of immense and rich Africa, there is one underlying principle that is not complex. In 1945 Europe, too, had enormous problems. Let us remember the fact that, successful as was the Marshall Plan, it was financed by as little as one per cent of the national income of the United States.

A plan whereby the "Have" nations would create a Council of statesmen, bankers, engineers, scientists, economists, and industrialists to catalogue each "Have-Not" country's needs and provide a pool of talent and a pool of resources to plan for their priority development problems, would be of such far-reaching consequences as to be of a revolutionary character.

Here the bankers of the world, with their network of branches and agencies, their connections with banks in countries all over the world, could play a great role. Sense of purpose, wedded to co-ordination, and managed by such a Council, is the vital step to progress.

I must repeat again that the realization of such a pool arrangement directed by the Council would not simply be a boon to the troubled lesser developed nations, but would be of world-wide significance in the tremendous prosperity it would necessarily create.

Does this sound familiar? In a way it should remind us of the possibility of unification of resources for political and military purposes as was done in the creation of NATO. It should remind us also of a romantic and heart-warming story of how the brutal antagonisms of centuries were sloughed off through the work of a realist who dreamed realistic dreams. When the dream was revealed, the answer was always "Impossible!" The insensate hatreds of countless generations stood in the way.

But Jean Monet, diplomat-businessman, showed the way. First, he started with a pact between Germany and France, surely an audacious proposal! He brought together the coal from one and the iron ore from the other to create a unified steel complex. This, in turn, led to the very much talked-of, and by now eminently successful, European Common Market. Indeed, it is so successful that Great Britain and other countries are exploring the possibilities of joining. From this startling concept, born of his feeling that two shattering world wars taught some people something, Monet is convincing more and more people that what had been sneered at for centuries, a United States of Europe, might come into existence in our time.

If Mr. Monet could bring about this revolution of thought, of plan, of design, it was because of his realization that the conditions were present for the catalyst. He became that catalyst. Why cannot we appreciate that similar co-ordination and thought, repeated on a wider scale, can bring about the answer to our problem?

Surely, if the Western nations would have the courage to embark on a co-ordinated venture on a planned scale of great proportions, they would see, in the melding of resources and people, a unique combination of know-how and leadership. This partnership would make it possible in time, and with imagination, to rewrite the texts so that there would no longer be a subject of discussion under the title "Rich Nations" and "Poor Nations", the "Developed" and the "Lesser Developed", the "Haves" and the "Have-Nots", but rather "Partners In An Industrial World".

There are innumerable difficulties and there are heartbreaks on the way. Complacency is the chief enemy. We run the risk of losing contact with the rest of mankind. Wealth and complacency too often walk together and in their solitude fail to understand the problem. Technical difficulties are another problem.

And, what about the immense significance of the population rise? Science, medical advances, and the geometrical progression of population increase have produced what has been called the "population explosion". This is a factor of enormous consequence, and we must accomplish much to stand still, and run twice as fast to get anywhere at all.

May I engage in a personal reference by telling you of a symposium which the Seagram Company arranged as part of its concern with public affairs. At this forum, held in New York in September 1959, some very great figures of international reputation, Lord Russell, Sir Julian Huxley, Ashley Montague, Hermann Muller, and the poet, Robert Frost, addressed themselves to a question of "The Future of Man", which took into account the accelerated rate of the world's population growth.

Huxley provocatively stated: ". . . the rethinking of our destiny is urgently needed now". The moral of the story is that we must act now before the rising tide of population makes it infinitely more difficult.

Still another problem is that not all nations arrive at the same level of know-how and political acumen at the same time. However, although nations are not all on the same level of industrial development, it is possible to formulate a plan whereby a nation receiving assistance on one level in turn passes on help to a nation lower down on the industrial scale.

Israel is a very good example of what I mean. Israel has been helped by many larger and industrially advanced nations but, in turn, because of her centres of science and technology, is able to pass on some of these skills to many nations of the Afro-Asian bloc. Israel cannot supply capital nor consumables, but she can contribute to the more industrially primitive countries what she does for herself in her own country.

In this proposal to assist the new nations of the Afro-Asian world, or even the nations of the Latin American hemisphere, the West also faces the problem of the lack of co-ordination. The United States, for example, on its own, through its own planning and direction, from the inception of the Marshall Plan to date, has expended ninety billion dollars on aid, not including military aid. The United Kingdom on its own is spending half a billion dollars per year on similar economic assistance.

Canada has a share in the Colombo Plan and has also come to the assistance of others through various forms of aid. In the sixteen years since the end of World War II, Canada's financial assistance abroad totals $4,629,450.00 (two billion post-war relief and reconstruction; two billion for NATO for mutual aid; half a billion for economic aid programme). This is all to the good, but it is not co-ordinated into a Western bloc master plan whereby the industrially skilled nations should help build those nations which are without skills and often without a trained leadership.

We stand at a moment in time when the tide is running and, to borrow from Shakespeare, if taken at the flood, will lead on to fortune; if omitted, will be a voyage in shallows and in miseries. I fear that without a plan conceived with imagination, co-ordinating, and organizing an interplay of aid and assistance, we shall be unrealistic. But, I foresee that with such a plan, conceived in enlightened self-interest and bound together with altruism, we shall be realistic.

I see in the successful implementation of a co-ordinated large-scale world effort such great results in building up primitive and under-developed states into busy and prosperous domains, that those countries which have an entirely different view of economics, the Communist states, will not be able to refrain from examining this handiwork, and will be forced to admit to its realities. This may yet be the secret weapon of the cold war.

If Abraham Lincoln was right in stating that the United States could not exist half-slave and half-free, then it is equally true, on a global scale, that the world of today, shrunk to a very tiny size, cannot exist half-prosperous and half-starved.

It has been said that only those who believe in modern-day miracles are the realists. Here, indeed, is a dream of reality! There are wondrous things to be done. There are ways and means of converting this very small world of ours, now rent with poverty, disease, dissension, instability, into one where all can share in earth's bounties by developing the resources of their lands and bring peace and fulfilment to their people.

Modern Wonder: Some Can Still Work

This is the second most important day in the lives of a charming young Montreal couple, Arnold and Sue Carol Isaacson, writes Morris Fish in the Montreal Star. August 27, 1961, the day they were married, still ranks ahead of 1962 Convocation day. But it's close. They both received degrees at McGill's spring convocation. Arnold, who this year held a major McGill scholarship, was awarded a bachelor of civil law degree. Sue Carol received a bachelor of arts.

Some university students can't even find enough time to study. They have a lot to learn from the Isaacsons. Both held important extra-curricular positions on campus: this year Arnie was executive editor of the McGill Law Journal, a difficult and time-consuming job; while Sue Carol headed the Combined Charities campaign, a major student undertaking.

Because one of them had to find remunerative work, and because her curriculum seemed the more compatible with outside employment, Sue Carol held down two part-time jobs while running the charities campaign, studying her courses, and performing all the household duties incumbent upon a young married woman.

Arnie didn't just sit back and let his wife work — whenever necessary he helped his wife with domestic chores (though he insists he did little more than eat his wife's delicious meals), and won a scholarship which more than covered his tuition fees.

He also worked hard to entertain his classmates — by being host at delightfully stimulating parties, and by sheepishly slipping into every morning lecture at least 10 minutes late. Arnie is now preparing to enter the notarial profession.

ly promote acceptance of a tyrannical and cruel dictator."

The Nazi party program held before the Germans a model of a state based on the same principles as the authoritative German family, he claimed. Thus when Hitler demanded absolute authority for himself, this was neither absurd nor dangerous to a large percentage of Germans.

"It merely offered them a situation to which they had become accustomed not only from infancy in their home life, but also in their schools, work experience, and military service."

Hitler also appealed to the German love of cleanliness when he told them they must clean out the dirty foreigners and impure elements of the population, Dr. Bromberg said; and he appealed to their love of manliness with his strong, aggressive, vengeful, and allegedly protective policies, says the Globe and Mail.

Dr. Kersten's works published in Germany, include "The German Revolution of 1848", and biographies of Frederick the Great, Bismarck, Peter the Great, and Georg Forster, an eighteenth century scholar and scientist. He also edited the diaries of the wife of Dostoevski and translated several books into German, among them Edmond de Goncourt's "Germinie Lacertieux."

He was a member of the International PEN Club and American secretary of the Association of German Writers Abroad, says the New York Times. Surviving are his widow, Mrs. Martha David-Kersten; a sister; Elizabeth Kersten, of Lahfelden, Germany; and two stepchildren, Alice David, of New York, and Martin Davis, of Auburn, N.Y.

A New Book: "A Journey Into Judaism"

A new book by Dr. Leo Trepp, "Eternal Faith, Eternal People," unfolds the history and heritage of the Jewish people and the Jewish faith. Subtitled, "A Journey Into Judaism," it has been published by Prentice-Hall. Dr. Trepp has provided a concise general outline of Judaism, satisfying, at one time, the need of the people within his own faith for a terse treatment of the history of Judaism, and an explanation of Judaism for the non-Jewish reader. He follows the development of present-day Jewish customs and practices from their biblical origins through all the significant events that formed Jewish history and culture.

The Jewish year, including Rosh Hashonah, Yom Kippur, Hanukah, Purim and Passover, is explained in detail. Hanukah, for instance, is traced back to Judas Maccabee's revolt against the attempted Hellenization of Jewish Culture and religion in 167 B.C. And the little realized Greek influence on Jewish thinking is seen in the Jewish acceptance of Aristotelian logic and the Platonic ideal of universal education, in the effect of Greek thought on the late books of the Bible: Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes. The great men, too, that helped form the faith and culture, their philosophies, Hasidism and Zionism, to name but two, are pictured within their times, their places in the vast Jewish heritage, and in their lasting effect upon the thought of their people.

The reader learns how the various Jewish communities lived under the rule of history's monarchs and how they reacted, for example, to the benevolence of Alexander the Great and the treatment given them by Napoleon. The powerful factor of anti-Semitism, from its ancient roots to the present, is studied. The author points out how the highly moral community of Jews served to mirror the deteriorated Roman society and trigger active anti-Semitism. The foundations of the same prejudices existing today are seen in the writings of Juvenal in Rome of Haman during the Syrian persecution. The "new" anti-Semitism of today and the Jewish reaction to it is treated at length toward the conclusion of the book.

From the biblical beginnings and Abraham's migration from Chaldaea to Canaan, to an examination of the present complexion of Judaism, Dr. Trepp's book answers the questions asked of Judaism by readers of all faiths, and is a strong step toward mutual understanding. "Eternal Faith, Eternal People" is profusely illustrated with maps, charts, and photographs, some never before published.

Leo Trepp, Rabbi, (Rabbinical Seminary, Berlin), Ph.D., (Wuerzburg), is a practicing rabbi and teaches Philosophy and Humanities at Napa and Santa Rosa Junior Colleges, in California. He has drawn the material for his book from many sources, including his own experiences as a rabbi in Germany and the United States, and his acquaintance with Jewish life in Europe and Israel.

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada printed in any language reaching the Jewish community which is not sponsored by a group or an organization and which is able to claim membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations.

She was gowned in white peau de soie, embroidered with seed-pearl-beads, cut with a fitted bodice; a scooped neckline; short sleeves; and full, bouffant skirt with a chapel train. Her veil of tulle illusion was draped to a crystal crown; and she carried a prayer book with white and pink orchids. Miss Marilyn Rapoport, sister of the groom, was maid of honour. She wore a gown of turquoise-blue peau de soie; which had a beaded bodice, and bell-shaped skirt. Her crown was of white and blue carnations; and she carried a cascade of the same flowers. Israel Helps Developing Countries, Gets Back Goodwill, Fast Friendship

BY SYLVIA KOWITT

Israel is a small country, still struggling to develop in face of difficult external problems and a paucity of natural resources. Yet, in the thirteen years of its existence it has managed to elaborate a broad program of technical co-operation with more than sixty-one countries of Asia, Africa, the Mediterranean and Latin America. Placing the scope of Israel's efforts in this field in perspective, a country with the population of the United States would have to send approximately 360,000 experts abroad annually and receive more than one million foreign students for training in its institutions.

Considering the extent of Israeli aid programs, one might well wonder why a state which is still receiving aid from other, larger powers should strain resources already overburdened with the needs of development. The roots of Israeli sympathy with Africa, for example, stretch back to the turn of the century. Theodor Herzl, architect of Zionism, said that upon achieving their own freedom, the Jews would turn to Africa to help the people of that continent to gain their birthright. Humanitarian interest and a pioneering spirit carried over from the Biblical mandate "to be a light unto the peoples" certainly lies at the heart of Israel's motives.

There are also more mundane, practical features of Israel aid. While few commercial advantages accrue for Israel in its fostering of agriculture and industry in Africa and Asia, increased trade has furthered the growth of the Red Sea port of Eilat and hopefully will influence the development of

has received contributions totalling almost three-quarters of a million dollars from the Council of Units since the inception of this group. This year, an estimated $45,000 will be raised, according to a report given by Mrs. M. Pinsky, in her president's review of the year's work, at the donor dinner, at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel. Although the hospital had benefitted to a certain extent by the Quebec Hospitalization Plan, it was necessary to provide additional funds for hospital maintenance, and to be able to continue the same high standard of care and rehabilitation for the patients. The thirty-eight Units, raised this money through individual teas and money showers and by working in conjunction with each other in these projects: bazaar, souvenir program, subscription fund, Golden Book, membership, and donor luncheon. The Hospital Drama Group, now in its fourth year, produced and staged two theatre night performances. "A View From the Patio", written and directed by Mrs. David Ritchie, was presented for the first time at this donor dinner as the feature entertainment. The Hospital visiting committee visited patients weekly and informed the Council of personal needs of the patients who had no evident means. Cigarettes, small toiletries, and treats were distributed during these visits. A new Volunteer Service was inaugurated last year with members attending the Occupational Therapy Departments three times a week to help and encourage the patients with their work. In March the life membership project was initiated, and fifty-five women have already become life members. Some of these had come from the Chai Patroness Group. Mrs. Pinsky appealed to Montreal women at large, as well as members, to become affiliated with either group. A Chai Patroness pays $18. yearly; a life member, $100. A plaque is being erected in the hospital for enscribing the names of the life members. The Council sponsored parties and concerts for the patients. Gifts totalling 660 were distributed. Hospital of Hope, by placing accent on chronically ill patients, has relieved the pressure on space in the general hospitals, as well as answering the need of desperate families who cannot cope with long-term illness in the home. At present there are 138 beds, filled to capacity. Mrs. Pinsky hoped that in the near future the hospital would be enlarged so that the long list of waiting applicants could be accommodated. Non-sectarian, the Jewish Hospital of Hope is the only fully accredited, English-speaking hospital for the chronically ill in the Province of Quebec. Unit meeting on June 18, at 8.00 p.m., is: Ben-Zion and Chana Siegal, at the home of Mrs. H. Siegal, 830 Dunlop Avenue. A World Half-Prosperous, Half-Starved

Address to the Canadian Club, of Toronto

BY SAMUEL BRONFMAN, OF MONTREAL, RETIRING PRESIDENT OF THE CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS

The Canadian Club has a distinguished record as a forum created in the public interest for the examination of ideas, local, national, and international. Your list of visitors is a long one and many a noted thinker has spoken on this platform. I am happy indeed to have been invited, pleased to accept, and I welcome the opportunity to express publicly what I have been concerned with privately for some time.

There can be no doubt in my mind that wherever the state of the world is considered and discussed, thinking people are much concerned about our future. I do not refer to the nuclear age, or the space age problems, but rather to the unrest and discontent among so many peoples whose nationalistic spirit is such a prime factor in all our economic, social, and political calculations.

Though it is a commonplace observation, we can usefully reiterate that we live in the most revolutionary age that man has witnessed. Among the most startling of these events has been the emergence of nations, not too well-favoured by history or geography, which, nevertheless, blown on the world scene by the winds of change, constitute in numbers and potential a determining factor in world affairs. I refer to what have been variously called the "Rich Nations" and the "Poor Nations"; "The Haves" and "The Have-Nots"; or, what I prefer as a neater description, "The Developed" and the "Lesser Developed" Nations.

What has suddenly brought these formerly remote peoples of varying levels of civilization into focus today when they were but vague geographic expressions yesterday? And, secondly, if not more importantly, what challenge does this create for older nations favoured by history, geography, and experience? Thirdly, what ways and means have we, or can we devise, to meet such a changing world?

For, of course, the world has become a small planet, and everyone in places far away from the centres of industrial and commercial life realizes today what a high standard these industrially developed nations enjoy. For today in the jet age and by television and radio, everyone has a window on his neighbours.

Let us remind ourselves that these developed nations themselves once went through birth pangs in the industrial period of their growth. Today an industrial democracy means that all sections of the population may share in the industrial life of the nation by owning shares in the industries and commercial and trading companies. The average citizens become, so to speak, partners in the enterprises of which they are shareholders and, by means of the pension fund millions of wage earners acquire a vested interest in the companies in which they are employed.

The story of the growth of our complex industrial society, a growth which has occurred over many centuries, has great relevance to our subject today and the Western nations, because of their own growth and experience, are now able to assist the lesser developed countries to bridge the gap which separates them from modern development by designing plans and methods which will enable them to use their natural resources to the best advantage.

It is human nature to attribute one's deficiencies and misfortunes to others. Likewise the newer nations, recently created from the resources of former Imperial Powers, have blamed yesterday's rulers for today's economic hardships. Man is ever reaching for improvement and when we realize the spirit of unrest in our own society, add to this the problem of our youth, then we must appreciate how great is the problem amongst peoples who, by comparison, have very little and are being continuously prodded into discontent.

In truth, the nub of this whole matter is that we must realize that with the world shrunken as it is, it cannot continue to exist half-prosperous and half-starved.

Even around our own corner we see that the republics of South America and the islands of the Caribbean, which certainly have abundant natural resources, lack capital, lack know-how, and, as important, lack the experience necessary to co-ordinate capital and skills into profitable projects.

Here we have a continent of twenty-odd republics which for many years looked to the leadership of their northern friend and neighbour, the United States. Then came World War II and it became difficult to continue that close relationship. With peace in 1945 we had a most serious European problem where countries laid low by the destructive acts of war had to be rehabilitated. It was obviously a priority problem to render them large scale assistance, and this in a very, very great hurry.

To this end the United States created the Marshall Plan, which, with its successor plans and related plans of other Allied Nations, did wonders in pump-priming in European countries which had native resources and know-how but needed an infusion of direct help to get all of this mobilized. As a direct result these countries were restored to the state of their former prosperity and even beyond.

Meantime the United States was so busily engaged in the various plans to meet the needs of the nations formerly and directly at war, with the continuous negotiations over the misunderstandings since Yalta, and with Russia further extending its spheres of influence, there was no time for the United States to pick up the threads of its South American interests.

Moreover, one would have thought that the opportunities enjoyed by the South American countries to sell huge quantities of supplies at high prices to the warring nations would have been such a boon to their economies that they would require no further help and, truth to tell, it was not apparent for some years after the war that South America again needed assistance.

Most of the emergent states of Asia and Africa, however, still lack such basic things as sanitation, elementary education, crop expansion to avert starvation, clean drinking water and irrigation, a modicum of industrial development, and an upright and competent administration to cast out rampant corruption.

Only small groups have a specific social or political outlook; and personal rivalry is liable to upset any orderly regime, as it did in the Congo and Laos. Independence can be won or given overnight, but it may take the labour of generations to establish a proper national existence and supply the people's needs. For all this, they need external aid.

This was emphasized by a talented and clear-sighted Asian statesman, Mr. P. M. Kairala, former Prime Minister of Nepal, who recently spoke of the dangers facing human liberties and democratic Socialism if the free and developed peoples, possessing the vital resources, do not extend sorely needed aid to the new nations.

The events in the Congo are a further grave warning to the free nations. Why should anyone in Europe, America, or Australia care who runs this new State? There are Congo tribes which only fifty years ago were cannibals and the world neither knew nor cared. Today the world is shaken by a conflict between a Prime Minister and a President of that same country. For in these fifty years, a world formerly fragmented by distances has become one, though not yet united, and whatever happens in one country now affects all.

I would ask you to recall the years just prior to D-Day and then immediately after the cessation of World War II. What was most significant? Armies, navies, air force, treaties, political settlements? Not at all! The most important thing was for the victors to come quickly to the help of the vanquished, otherwise the fruits of victory would quickly have turned sour and the purposes of fighting a war to defeat Fascism and Nazism would have been ironically perverted to a titanic struggle to pave the way for that other "ism", Communism.

Cast your eyes over the new political map of 1962 and you will see the many nations of the Afro-Asian bloc, many of them as new as yesterday's newspaper, and you graphically realize this is a new world in which we live. It is not even the world of 1952 or 1942, to say nothing of the turn of the century. The peoples of all these countries have suddenly come to life. They awake from almost a sleep of centuries and realize that part of the world enjoys a high standard of living, and a greater part exists on a low standard, while the greatest part is on a starvation standard.

If any warrant were needed to justify this statement, let us hear it from one of the acknowledged leaders of African emancipation, Doctor Hastings Banda, of Nyasaland, who confidently believes that his country will soon be an independent nation, stated significantly in an international radio broadcast only a week ago, "What new country can survive without aid? If I can't get it from the Western World, what do you expect me to do? Starve?"

These basic economic facts and these built-in psychological moods create an important political background. The strangest paradox exists. Whereas in the 19th century the fight was for the control of the "Have" territories, today the political fight is just as vigorous for the "Have-Not" territories. Certainly the great East-West conflict of today is the quest for influence in the "Have-Not" countries almost more than the interest in the "Have" countries.

Of the world's three billion inhabitants, only three-quarters of a billion can be said to be in a category of fair, to good, to high, living standards. From this depressing reality derives, perhaps, the greatest task facing the West. This task is not armament or disarmament. It is not who reaches the moon first or how to control nuclear fission, but rather it is the acceptance of the new tasks which the West itself made inevitable by the creation of its industrial machine and its industrial revolutions.

There is no escape from yet another harsh reality, that the modern world is conditioned by the Cold War. It is Communist world-domination versus the West's desire for free choice. We must act accordingly, and I feel that the West could do much to preserve its ideologies and to enrol new nations in its ambit were it to treat the situation with the seriousness that it treats war or politics.

I repeat, what ways and means have we, or can we devise, to meet such a changing World?

It is my dream, and I feel sure a dream of reality, that the developed "Have" nations should pool their huge resources of capital, know-how, or skills and techniques, experience and management, into a great organization. This organization could assess each of these lesser developed nations for the purpose of bringing that nation forward to modern standards by fostering business partnerships so that the peoples of these nations would feel they would be treated on the basis of equality as partners in the development of their land rather than offering them aid or loans. Without the advantage of our experience I am afraid the desired results would not be achieved.

This must be developed as a business proposition, fair to both sides, rather than by belittling these people with loans or aids which give them an inferiority complex. This organization, pooling the many resources of the "Have" nations, would form partnerships with individual citizens and business organizations in each of the "Have-Not" nations.

The partnership method would, I am sure, result in prosperity for

Ecumenical Council May Discuss Removal Of Stigma From Jews

The memorandum on the Ecumenical Council submitted by the World Conference of Jewish Organizations (COJO), to the Vatican, was from the Canadian Jewish Congress as among the organizations on whose behalf it was presented. The dispatch carried by the Jewish Telegraphic Agency from Rome read as follows:

The forthcoming Ecumenical Council, to be convened here by Pope John XXIII next October, will probably discuss ways of removing from the Jews the stigma of 'slayers of God', Augustin Cardinal Bea told representatives of the press. Cardinal Bea was the confessor to the late Pope Pius XII, and is now president of the Vatican's Secretariat for the Union of Christians, planning the agenda for the Ecumenical Council.

"The Catholic Church", said the Cardinal, "recognizes that a principal reason for anti-Semitic persecutions through the ages has been the fact that the Jewish people were blamed by Christians for the crucifixion of Jesus. It is high time for this stigma to be removed," the Cardinal said.

Under Pope John XXIII, various steps toward reduction of anti-Semitism have already been taken. Two years ago, the Pope revised the Easter ritual so as to eliminate references to 'perfidious Jews' allegedly responsible for the killing of the Christ.

Cardinal Bea told the press that representatives of all non-Catholic Christian churches who want to attend the Ecumenical Council will be invited. He did not indicate whether Jewish observers will also be admitted. Leading Jewish organizations in the United States have been discussing for some time whether to seek an invitation to the Ecumenical Council as observers, and Dr. Nahum Goldmann discussed the matter with Cardinal Bea here recently.

Vatican sources indicated that some Jewish suggestions for the Ecumenical Council have been received. Jewish organizations are especially interested in having the Council condemn anti-Semitism and modify the emphasis in the Catechism on Jews as 'God killers'.
